Street Life 1939-1945, generously supported and funded by the Heritage Lottery Fund, was a two-year community heritage project in 2015 to 2017 that involved many local people in many different ways. Volunteers carried out research, oral history interviews, photography, fieldwork and were involved in tour participation to record and present the history of selected towns in Fenland and East Cambridgeshire.

The project focused on the towns of Chatteris, Ely, Littleport and Soham during the Second World War to encourage people to look more closely at their built environment, to discover great stories and to connect with people from the past. We discovered how daily and family life continued as the community coped with rationing and the impact of the war as well as how local buildings have changed use over time or disappeared entirely. The project captured memories, stories and information that otherwise might have been lost as well as giving local people an understanding of their local heritage and what the community used to be like over 70 years ago.

Littleport

HAD A POPULATION
AROUND
4500

During the Second World War in this area, most people lived in small gas-lit places. There were few cars and even fewer bright lights. Towns were grey brick, dull, quite isolated working settlements with most people employed within easy reach of their homes, often in agriculture or crafts and industries related to the rich soil of the Fens.

Littleport, population of around 4,500 at the time, although lying alongside the River Ouse was no longer a port. Despite being on the A10, traditionally it was quite an inaccessible settlement only really opened up by the main railway line from London to Kings Lynn in 1845. The village served the surrounding agricultural area with Hope Brothers, a shirt maker, being the major employer. The village still nursed long memories of the notorious Bread Riots of 1816 when a Littleport mob marched on Ely demanding better pay to buy flour and subsequently five men from the town were hanged in Ely.
